

CAFE BOMBAY

I have a friend whose parents own a restaurant called Cafe Bombay. He recently asked me if I could help him with a rebranding of the restaurant and that would include a website. I haven’t spoken to him about it much since he first mentioned it but I thought it would be good practice with real world application if I created a website using some of the information from his current website.

NAVIGATION:
I would like it to be pretty predominant when you land on the page but as you scroll down it will become smaller in size and stay at the top of the screen. Clicking on the navigation will take the viewer to the section. Individual pages might be created if text is too long; ie About Us, Printable Menu, or Services section.

LANDING IMAGE:
I would like to use a parallax image here with a possible light gradient on the bottom so I can have some sort of call to action/button.

ABOUT US:
After parallax image, flat section with text. Not sure if I need to add anything else to it. But I think this will be pretty plain.

Possible link to another individual page if the description get’s too lengthy and image is required.

MENU IMAGE:
Another parallax image right before the Menu section

MENU NAVIGATION:
Float left and vertically stacked. I’d like to highlight the section that the person is viewing.

MENU:
Each part of the menu will have a new “page”. The white menu section will “slide right or left” when another part of the menu is clicked, acting like a page in a book.

LOCATION:
I would like to integrate google maps into the site. If we could plug in an address and get directions to the restaurant that would be great.
